When the traveler was taken to his barracks, he complained to an American sergeant that his wounds were severe enough to require medical attention. The American sergeant told the traveler that he would be sent to Camp Fuji, but other than telling the traveler that the wounds were not life-threatening, the American sergeant also “didn’t know a whole lot about” and had “no medical training.” The traveler explained that his wounds required medical care and asked the American sergeant to give him the names of doctors and medical personnel at Camp Fuji who would “take care of it.” The American sergeant did not provide such information, and, instead, simply told the traveler to “go back on the bus.” The traveler eventually received medical treatment at Camp Fuji. The traveler testified that his wounds required the following treatment: “I had to get septicemia, sepsis and severe infection.” He stated that “[t]he wound didn’t heal right,” and the bullet “kept coming out. It just never healed right,” and, as a result, the wound needed to be constantly debrided. The traveler testified that the doctors at Camp Fuji “cleaned it out” and “kept taking out.” It was during this period
