With Apple Watch set to reach the mainstream and steadily increasing sales, more and more people are jumping in to make the smartwatch the device of choice. But all that hardware needs its own app, which was previously available via the now-canceled Apple Watch app, and is now in beta for the first time. The Apple Watch app wasn't the only casualty of this week's iOS 11.3 update. Although the much anticipated Messages app saw many iOS 11.3 features activated, another app that has been long-requested by iPhone users to one day allow easy group texting and chat with others has been added to iOS in the Apple Watch app. For those that are not aware, it is called Group FaceTime. The Group FaceTime feature will allow two or more of the users to use their Apple Watches to communicate with one another using the audio and video features already found in the Apple Watch. This new feature is enabled using a new pair of Watch app features. The main feature is Screen Sharing. As the name implies, it is the ability to share your screen with others using the Apple Watch. The second feature, call notifications, allows the user to be notified by the Apple Watch when someone calls your Apple Watch or sends a message. Though I find that is a little strange that Apple doesn't offer this natively within the Messages app, I think the feature works well. Other than the obvious problem of text size, I find that it can be difficult to see someone send a message on a Watch. With Screen Sharing, I can then watch or call them on the Watch without any small issues. Finally, the one feature I really look forward to is the ability to communicate with many people at the same time. I know when I'm going to a concert, sporting event or even have a family gathering and am working, I want to see all of my family members are able to talk to me simultaneously. This means bringing an Apple Watch to a gathering. I think the feature looks great and works great, but it's a little more of a hassle using the Siri Shortcuts in iOS 11.3 beta to communicate. As with most things Apple these days, the feature does make it easier
