Q: Does a relational database have an order of operations equivalent to what we have for a Turing Machine? I'm often trying to prove that a problem is hard for a Turing Machine or a MapReduce algorithm, but I'm often not good at thinking in terms of one or the other, I usually just try to reason about the two and rely on what I know of the two to prove that the problem is either NP-Hard or NP-Complete. I'm trying to figure out if there is a way I can model that reasoning in relation to a Relational Database, and I'm not sure if that is even possible. An algorithm doesn't really care about the order of operations and there doesn't seem to be any reason why they need to be ordered to be useful. However, in a relational database, the order of operations seems to matter. E.g., insert into users (id,name) values (1, 'bob') Inserts the row into the users table, while insert into users (id,name) values (1,'bob') Inserts the row into the users table, but if the second is run before the first, it will likely get the same id as the first and cause the application to get an error. I guess it might be doable in some cases, but in others it doesn't seem to matter. In those other cases, however, there is no need for ordering, and the TM doesn't need to care about it either. I'm just interested in general in what a TM does or doesn't need to be able to order operations in and whether a database is capable of doing so. A: The answer is that it depends on how you model the data. A lot of people tend to use the "store everything as-is in the DB and then run queries on them" kind of model, but there are other options that can be used and
