[Characterization of the peptide-induced T-cell response in dogs infected with Leishmania infantum chagasi]. To characterize the immune response induced in dogs infected with Leishmania infantum chagasi to soluble parasite antigens. Two groups of seven and five dogs were infected with L. infantum chagasi and the response of their lymph node and spleen cells to soluble antigens was studied by enzymatic methods and ELISA. A higher number of lymph node and spleen cells showed proliferative response to soluble antigens in the infected group, when compared to the controls. The proliferative response showed a polyclonal pattern of lymphocyte stimulation to the mitogenic stimulus. Natural killer cells had no cytotoxic activity against both infected and uninfected controls. The increase in the number of lymph node and spleen cells after infection with L. infantum chagasi suggests a proliferative response to soluble parasite antigens.Hylocereus caspicus Hylocereus caspicus is a species of flowering plant in the mallow family known by the common names desert holly, Caspian holly, and Caspian Holly. It is native to the southwestern United States and northern Mexico, where it grows in scrub and desert habitat, often in arid and rocky soils, such as those found in the U.S. states of California, Arizona, and Nevada. Its stems reach a maximum length of but typically grow much shorter. The leaves are deciduous, initially oval-shaped but becoming linear in form as the plant grows. The leaves are up to in length. The inflorescences, appearing in late spring and summer, bear many small white or pale pink flowers with yellow-orange centers. The fruit is a capsule up to long containing many tiny seeds.
