The most popular model for long-term memory (LTM) formation is suggested to rely on an ongoing reactivation of the memory trace in the spines and their microglial neurons of the dendritic arbor. Recent studies have challenged the role of the spine and microglial neuron model, claiming that LTM is not likely to be formed solely within spines. A review of the published data indicates that upon dendritic spine reactivation, more commonly than not there is a strong reactivation of microglial neurons in the dendritic arbor as well. Also, the induction of LTM is not perturbed by a loss of dendritic spine function. We conclude that dendritic spines are not a necessary component for memory consolidation in the vertebrate brain. We discuss the potential mechanisms of information transfer within the neuronal network and suggest that LTM formation is likely to occur in the neuronal network as a whole.
