For the purpose of writing multi-threaded programs, in which a plurality of threads are executed simultaneously, a processor is provided with a mechanism that can prevent processes executed by the plurality of threads from mutually influencing one another. FIG. 1 illustrates a sequence of processes (which will be referred to as "processes A, B, C, and D") that are executed by a conventional processor. Process A is executed by a first thread T1. Process B is executed by a second thread T2. Processes C and D are executed by a third thread T3. T1 and T3, which will be described later, are not executed by the same thread, and thus process A does not directly influence processes C and D. Furthermore, process B does not directly influence process C or D. Process A is executed by a first thread T1, and the beginning of process A can be represented by "TA", in which TA is executed by the first thread T1. Subsequently, "BA" and "CC", which will be described later, are executed by the first thread T1 in the same way. Subsequently, the beginning of process B can be represented by "TB", in which TB is executed by the second thread T2. The contents of BA and TB are communicated to process C. However, process B can be executed independently of the first thread T1. Thus, process B does not depend on information that is obtained by process A. The beginning of process C can be represented by "TC", in which TC is executed by the third thread T3. The beginning of process D can be represented by "TD", in which TD is executed by the third thread T3. In a case in which process B depends on the first thread T1, processes C and D are executed by different threads, and thus the first thread
