M3 RAW Drive Recovery free is a software for recovering lost data from your hard drive . Temperature-induced phase transition of coexisting water and capillarity effects in monolayer lipid membranes. Monolayer lipid membranes (MLM) were prepared by spread (lipid molecules) in organic solvent from monosialoganglioside (1,2-distearoyl-sn-glycero-3-phosphoethanolamine-N-[m-(7-amino-4-methylcoumarin-3-acetamido)]-succinamide) at room temperature (21 degrees C). As a result of spreading, monosialoganglioside molecules self-assembled into the bilayer-type membrane. Temperature-induced phase transition of the MLM was observed by time-resolved fluorescence spectroscopy. The thermotropic behavior indicated that the MLM consisted of the isotropic phase (water-disordered phase) at room temperature, the liquid-ordered phase (lipid-ordered phase) at 42 degrees C, and the gel phase at 52 degrees C. The present MLM showed the temperature-induced phase transition in contrast to the previously studied MLM consisting of pure water which showed the transition at about 57 degrees C. Addition of 8-10 mol% cholesterol suppressed the transition. Based on these results, the present MLM was considered to contain both water and capillarity effects and the melting temperature of the lipid phase was probably affected by the water-capillarity coexistence. The present temperature-induced phase transition in the MLM was completely reversible and was found to have a similar transition to that of D2O/chloroform solution system. Therefore
