A: Your "math[n]" is referencing the string "Math in Action" not any array. All arrays have a length property. If you want a reference to the first string in the array of strings you can do: var math = "Math in Action"; or var math = "Math in Action".substr(0, Math.LENGTH_OF_MATH); Then you can use it as an array: math[0]; math[1]; ... You might know Mark Hurd for being one of Oracle's co-founders, but all that really means is that he used to be. Hurd is no longer a part of Oracle. The now-former HP board member and vice president resigned and effectively quit on Thursday, the company said in a statement. "Mr. Hurd's actions were inconsistent with the Company's Code of Business Conduct and Ethics," Oracle said. Let that settle in. Hurd is a bit of an enigma. He graduated from Stanford with a degree in economics, and he served as HP's CEO from 2000 to 2003. He resigned in March 2003 because of a "personal error in judgment," HP said at the time. But his HP stint didn't end well. In 2005, he was indicted on criminal charges over charges of fraud. In 2009, the New York Times wrote an article detailing Hurd's law-breaking past. In 2009, HP board members reviewed Hurd's pay package, which included a $70 million severance payout. Hurd later left HP and joined Oracle in 2009. Hurd's resignation was announced on Thursday. In Oracle's announcement, the company said Hurd "gave the board no indication that he was contemplating or intending to resign." But Hurd is stepping down as the company's vice president of HP's operations unit, Oracle said in a statement. The company did not disclose Hurd's specific reason for leaving, but said he has been having second thoughts on returning to work. "At HP, Mark has led a broad and successful team that has accomplished a great deal," Oracle said in a statement. "We are tremendously proud of our partnership with Mark and the company's achievements."Frequently Asked Questions "Can I keep my name on the profile if I change my last name
