legs. the robots software, called knura, is intended to allow engineers to learn and practice the principles of robotics. the system uses arm and leg movements to create a virtual "finger" to open and close door locks, a "hand" to pick up household objects and a "head" to look at objects and use a 3d scanner. the team from the university of bath has created a system using microcomputers and arduino devices to allow home users to get involved in building their own robot. the new system allows users to create their own "factory built" robots capable of lifting, scanning, and transporting objects around a home. 3d scanning and printing lets you create paper-thin, 3d versions of almost any object and use them everywhere. virtual lego model of batnag - sometimes referred to as game of bricks - allows users to create 3d lego models, scan them and print them out.
