A new study in mice has found that one of the drug-abuse epidemic's most prevalent designer drugs, MDPV, can be detected in the brain 10 times faster than its precursor compound, mephedrone. The researchers think that should put the drug's risk level at the same level as other known potent stimulants such as cocaine and amphetamine. Mephedrone was recently banned in the UK, while several other synthetic cathinones like MDPV and 4-MEC (or mephedrone-4-methyl-ether) have shown up in drug seizures and emergency rooms in the U.S. But this is the first published study of the drug's ability to penetrate the brain. Mephedrone can be taken orally, but the drug is more common as a "bath salts" or "plant food" drug in injectable form. In the new study, scientists gave brain samples from both humans and mice to see how the drug would distribute in the region responsible for reward and motivation. "We found the drug is very rapidly transported into the brain in both species," said lead researcher Jeffrey L. Switzer, a psychiatrist and postdoctoral fellow at the University of Tennessee Health Science Center. "We think this offers a better understanding of the brain's response to the drug and suggests that MDPV is more potent than its parent compound." He said because the body rapidly clears the drug from the blood, he suspects it could easily cause "psychosis" if it was ingested orally, such as in food. But with the injection method, this effect is likely less pronounced. "You could drink a whole beer bowl of this stuff," he said. Switzer and his colleagues from the University of Tennessee in Knoxville, the University of Texas Medical Branch in Galveston and the University of Bern in Switzerland examined human autopsy brain tissue from post-mortem subjects as well as samples from drug-naïve and drug-experienced mice injected with MDPV. They found the drug was distributed rapidly in both the mouse and human brain. The drug was taken up into the dentate gyrus, an area involved in learning and memory, and the nucleus accumbens, a reward center. In the brain of mice who had experienced cocaine injections, the team saw the MDPV transport into this part of the brain was even faster. Switzer said his findings go beyond mephedrone alone. For example, he would suspect that if someone took a single dose of mephedrone, it wouldn't have the same sort of effect as cocaine. "With mephedrone, we saw a five-fold increase in brain concentrations in only 30 seconds," he said. "It's well within a clinically relevant time frame for it to cause a psychiatric disorder."
