responding to the question of whether it is possible to be more thoughtful, arthur coyle, director, knowledge capital finance (uk.kcf.co.uk), noted that corporate re-engineering and job shifting will begin to shift individuals into new roles. his comment, the “what ifs” will spawn and be used as the basis for a litany of “this will be different” scenarios. it is inevitable. the big challenge is to manage and frame the changes. we are perhaps looking at a three-stage process in which we start with a “this will be different” scenario, we look for the “what if” i.e. what if scenario “xyz” was true, and then a third stage in which realignments and change take place so that we have some conviction of how it will actually unfold. thomas friedman, tom friedman , author, op-ed columnist for the new york times, and author of hot, flat, and crowded, said, one thing we dont want are technologists who are simply blind to the value of social interaction and human relationships because it is the infrastructure of the job market. what we want are technologists who are more reflective and who are able to interact with machines and humans as equals. stowe boyd, managing director of another voice and a well-known thinker on work futures, discussed the intangibles of preparing humans to partner with ai and bot systems: while we may see the creation and rollout of new training programs, he observed, its unclear whether they will be able to retrain those displaced from traditional sorts of work to fit into the workforce of the near future. many of the skills that will be needed are more like personality characteristics, like curiosity, or social skills that require enculturation to take hold. individual training like programming or learning how to cook may not be what will be needed. and employers may play less of a role, especially as ai- and bot-augmented independent contracting may be the best path for many, rather than a job. homesteading in exurbia may be the answer for many, with forty acres and a bot as a political campaign slogan of 2024.

other issues include a lack of quality. david tejada, a professor of education at the university of north carolina, wrote, it is an inherently flawed and limiting model. its basically a tool to extract something from the world rather than a process of actively producing knowledge and understanding. there is an inherent elitism to training, in the sense that you are not doing anything until you have the right background, either cultural or scholastic. and even if you have that training, its still elitist because those who have the time, the money, the location, and the luxury have all the access. and not every person has time to be in some institution around the clock. this was my excuse for a while for not getting training and certifications as a professional. training can always be better but its not a silver bullet. its good to have a certificate to say, your application is done. it is no longer the equivalent of a handshake. even as respondents expressed concern about training, one of the most striking findings from the survey was that technology had arguably had the biggest impact on training. shruthi gupta, a professor of computer science at the indian institute of technology, kanpur, commented, technology is disruptive, and training is not immune to it. i am convinced that technology will significantly reduce the demand for labor if it is intelligent enough, and it is not far away, so we must still prepare ourselves. yes, technology will definitely help in some aspects, but i am convinced that it will be a double-edged sword. technology has already brought about significant change, and more change is coming as more and more jobs are being automated. so the impact of technology is very real, but can we afford to automate what we already know about people?
