marc sartre uses the model of the state as a transfer agency to test the flexibility of the transfer mechanism in france and switzerland up to the first half of the nineteenth century. he examines several policies targeted at promoting industrialization and the growth of the manufacturing sector in which the state was said to be less involved than it was in the past. after a careful analysis of these attempts to increase state influence on the industrial sector, he concludes that these policies failed, though not because of a decline in the state impulse to promote industrialization, but because of the weaknesses of the mechanisms of state transfer. the effect of state efforts to promote industrialization in germany has often been assessed as much too intense and successful. much of the material presented here challenges this picture and shows, for example, that state policies were counterproductive in the long run. in fact, many of the leading figures of german industry, including carl von siemens, carl friedrich von siemens and carl and philipp reis, were keen to control german industry during the late 1880s. this volume provides a broad and detailed historical review of the world coal industry for the second half of the nineteenth century. the book is quite thorough in its analyses of the coal industry in russia, china, japan and the west. its most original aspect lies in its treatment of the industrys over-all modernization process. its success lies in providing a dense and detailed bibliography that will be useful to historians of other national economies and to students of the world economy of the period.

this book has provoked a wide range of commentaries from the international and trade policy literature. in some respects these observations and comments may seem exaggerated given the book is a very technical history. trade in the literature of political economy has come to play a critical role in understanding the politics and policies of protectionism. in this regard, the book's introductory chapter on european trade policy is consistent with the literature in showing that protectionism under the banner of "commercial integrity" was an international priority of the first half of the last century. the book's first chapter on the origins and the politics of the globalization "elite" is an important addition to the literature on the history and composition of globalization. indeed, its discussion of the changing composition of the elite, from the 1870s to the 1970s, is likely to make an important contribution to our understanding of the subject. this meeting brought together a diverse group of scholars and policy makers to address a central question in international relations in both the west and east: the relationship of "soft" and "hard" power. there were at least three underlying questions being asked: 1) how can soft power prevent the spread of authoritarian regimes; 2) how can hard power be harnessed to promote peace and stability in the balkans and europe; and 3) can a toolbox of soft and hard power, in which all powers are complementary, give a more effective and sustainable approach to statecraft. in this symposium papers focused on three of the many critical aspects of soft power: cultural influence, international and civic leadership, and the use of smart power and information as a general tool for promoting stability and peace. at the conference, scholars discussed the dominant theoretical underpinnings of current thinking about soft power and its implications for both the interaction of the united states and china. other talks grappled with the more subtle aspects of the mind-sets that different soft power tools appeal to and the ways in which the use of those tools can be tailored to suit specific states and issues. 5ec8ef588b
