After the nice push in the quality of lightrooms new photo on the back end, I am really looking forward to how they make the editing applications on the full computer. It's great having a single suite of tools that work across all your devices, even though the previously separate desktop applications really worked well that way. Lightroom is also an exciting new product, and if the final version really delivers on it's promise it will be around for quite some time, and be the title of the Photoshop Creative Cloud app for some time longer. In the meantime though, I still think a small list of features work best from on-screen keyboard, and that the rest, while they certainly aren't bad, aren't quite right for me to be giving this an 8.

The new feature, Content-Aware Move is based on Adobe's Content-Aware technology that identifies duplicates of selected areas by analyzing the contents of an image. The merge results are automatic; you can just do some fine-tuning through the content-aware tools. This may not be the fastest algorithm, but the content-aware technologies have shown a powerful solution for image retouching. Photoshop's new feature Content-Aware Fill was designed to remove unwanted objects, such as hair and specks, that stick to people's faces. It is very similar, but although they are not identical. The Mighty Carrot is a playful AI-based game made by the Microsoft Research Zurich AI Lab, and its outcome is to help you to do away with unwanted facial hair. The latest iteration of Photoshop allows you to save content-aware layer edits for later without having to make any subsequent changes to the image. It can be quite beneficial for when you want to move the color of an image without having to repaint parts of the original image and lose the previous changes. The implementation makes it a vast improvement over the previous version.
