An outbreak of phishing emails have been circulating around the world, targeting individuals at all levels of security. The attacks used in this campaign are aimed at compromising the user's email credentials, usually by tricking them into clicking on a link. Email addresses of compromised accounts are then sold on the dark web and sometimes on black markets or even as fake handles for online social networks. The first wave of attack started at the beginning of March. Various U.K.-based websites such as Yahoo and Sky were compromised. Later, The Independent broke the news that Japanese newspaper Sankei Shimbun was also affected. A few days later, Symantec researchers discovered a few emails sent through Gmail spoofing the address of Google. A couple of days after that, a spokesperson for the U.K.'s Home Office, confirmed that the emails had been sent from the communications team of the security ministry. The emails targeted various U.K. government departments such as the Home Office, HM Revenue and Customs, the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, and Department for Transport. It's not the first time the government has fallen victim to a phishing campaign, but this one is unusual in that the phishing emails were sent through legitimate channels that most users take for granted. The emails had all the hallmarks of a normal phishing attack, including an untagged personalised message. However, the phishing messages also had a.gov.uk domain, which allowed them to bypass many of the defenses in place against generic phishing attacks. What makes it even more surprising is the fact that these emails were sent through the official channels of the U.K. government. In order to prevent phishing attacks, a lot of thought goes into the design of these emails. The messages are from trusted sources, such as the government's emails, social network accounts, and banking websites. The format of the email, the message, and even the size of the embedded video and image were carefully designed to make the message look authentic.
