The Final Cut Pro review gave us a lot of insight into the inner working of Final Cut Pro. For one, we've found that the features absent from the free version work great in the paid Final Cut Pro X, which isn't entirely surprising when you remember that the vast majority of FCP's features aren't available at all without a purchase. However, it's a shame that FCP X doesn't provide support for H.265 (HEVC) or DNxHD. As a note, it seems that the Air Sharing features within Final Cut Pro are disappearing in the latest upgrade (it was possible to see your Final Cut Pro project within other Macs connected to your Mac through Time Machine, but that's no longer the case). If you use these features, we'd love it if you'd share your experience in the comments below. To begin with, Adobe's accompanying release of Lightroom 5.0 brings with it lots of technology and features that may bring a fresh set of eyes to the editing software. The first thing that catches the eye on the Windows version is the change in the Lightroom window. The new window is designed to give you a better view of your image set. The four new panels on the Lightroom 5 version are now arranged in a clockwise relative to the old panels or tabs. This new window allows you to navigate in a couple of ways. You can click on the thumbnail to land on a specific image. You can also select the image on the left to jump to it. Also, if you click on the metadata panel (top left), you will find yourself on a new panel that organizes images by size, date, and location.
