To compare the clinical outcomes of prostate brachytherapy with respect to organ displacement and variations in treatment parameters. The disease specific survival rates, biochemical failure-free survival rates, and complications were analyzed in 197 patients with prostate cancer who underwent brachytherapy between March 2000 and October 2004. The endpoint was biochemical failure, defined as a rise in prostate-specific antigen level of 2 ng/mL above the nadir. The application rates of dose-planning algorithms and variations in treatment parameters were studied. A significant difference in disease-specific survival was observed between patients with a bladder displacement (n = 15) and those without (n = 182, p = 0.014). Disease-specific survival rates at 3 years after brachytherapy were 70.7% and 97.1%, respectively. Moreover, significant differences were observed in biochemical-failure-free survival rates between the bladder displacement and non-displacement groups (p = 0.001). These differences persisted regardless of the dose distributions. Some variations in the dose prescription and dose calculation algorithms were observed in patients in the displacement group. Our results indicated that patients who demonstrated bladder displacement on digital rectal examination had a poorer disease-specific survival rate after brachytherapy.

Our Story Before the Trump Administration Before the Trump Administration, our mission was to inspire hope by providing direct spiritual services. A Blessing We feel strongly that we are a blessing to our clients. We believe that God is our strength, and we want to be an example of unity and inclusiveness, both in our hearts and service to others. We want our mission to change lives, and our clients to change the world. A Blessing We feel strongly that we are a blessing to our clients.
