Shot on a Kjaer Weis PB 740. Shot on a tripod with a 2x Annabelle lens mounted on it. Shot RAW, converted using the R1 raw processor preset. Some slight vibrance added to make it look older. Some of the shots can be seen on my Flickr site. RBG color files are a great alternative to JPG, and let you adjust the saturation and contrast of the image, as well as potentially look for areas that might need adjustment. For professional work, they are an excellent way to save disk space and ensure the sharpest possible image. I could not agree more with your point. Hopefully after the release of CS6 we will see a great Lightroom and Photoshop combination. Only for now do I find it frustrating when I create a Photoshop project using EI/EI raw, and then only the original file is shown and not the edited one. This is a huge problem. This is about the only place for the user to see the changes made and see if the edited image is acceptable or not. Before Lightroom 5 these options were available in a little box on the side of the screen. It seems much better than the JPG, because it is more direct, and it seems like there is a direct path for editing that mirror. However, it really is not good at all. I love the brushes and advanced selections that can be done in LR5 and I wish I could do something about the size of the editing window. If I compare the original EI file in PS with the "crop to format better" PS document I can see that the raw image is a lot bigger then the edited copy.
