I've used Adobe's Lightroom software for years, starting with version 1 on the iOS platform. It's in great shape and seems to keep getting the very latest updates and fixes. It's quick and easy to navigate, and amazingly you can create some amazing (and some amazing looking) images quickly and easily. For a long time, I seemed to have to struggle to find anything wrong with Lightroom, everything often coming up with barely noticeable 'sputtering' in the image and hardly any such spluttering found when editing my images in Elements. It was a breath of fresh air to use Lightroom with the Microsoft Windows Operating System though, and Lightroom 5 continues to make the best of the OS, even if the latest iOS operating system doesn't do a whole lot to make it stand out a bit. Adobe has really stepped up it's game with Lightroom 5, yet from adding new features to making the whole app twice as fast as version 4, version 5 doesn't make much of a change to the overall experience. With image import and display features, Lightroom 5 has grown up. You can now zoom into images at high fidelity without having to slim down the image to the small size set by the maximum size setting on your display. I tried zooming into a 640 x 960 image using Lightroom 5, and it actually worked just as well as zooming on the images I took just moments before. This meant zooming into a 10 megapixel image didn't need a third of the slowness as before.
